

In the video, three UI/UX portfolios were reviewed. The first portfolio exemplified a straightforward, easy-to-digest format with some personal information that let the recruiter get to know the creator. These features are important since recruiters go through so many different portfolios; therefore, adding personal information helps the person stand out and making it simple keeps the recruiter engaged. The second portfolio showed key examples and roles that the person played in specific projects, which is helpful for recruiters: since many people work on teams in projects, highlighting one's roles makes it easier to pinpoint what one produced. The third and final portfolio also showed experience and the person's design process, which shows the recruiter that the person knows what she is doing. It also highlighted some personal passions, which can help her stand out.

All three portfolios were strong but could have been even more compelling. First, it is important to cater one's portfolio to the job and/or company one is applying to, so the recruiter knows for sure that the candidate is right for the job. Along those same lines, the portfolio should highlight keywords and skills that the company is looking for in the position. This will help recruiters know that the candidate is capable of anything that he or she is asked to do. Similarly, one should explain what one did when it comes to responsibilities that the role may include. For example, if one is applying to a UX researching job, one might highlight the specific research process one did for a different project and how that contributed to the overall product.

It was interesting to think like a recruiter in the video, since it shows the viewer what recruiters will focus on when reviewing portfolios. Viewers see how to make their portfolios stand out and what they should or should not include.

Portfolio design is extremely important and relevant in the UI/UX field, since it shows recruiters what candidates are capable of. It allows the recruiter to get to know the candidate while also portraying experience and skills that give the candidate credentials for the job. It is much easier to be certain about hiring someone if one can see their work and how they will fit into the company. Portfolios also make the application process more personal, as candidates can show their passions and personality through their creations. Thus, portfolios are crucial for determining who to hire.

While looking at exemplary portfolios, several features stuck out to me that I plan to include in my own portfolio. I want to focus on the job I am applying for to incorporate key words and skills needed for the specific role. Similarly, I want to outline my roles and responsibilities in various projects. I also want to include a navigation bar at the top, which will make the portfolio easy to navigate and limit the amount of content on each page. I would also like to include some of my passions outside of my field, to let recruiters get to know me. I want the portfolio to be simple and effective, working on both mobile and web platforms. Finally, I want it to be easy to contact me. While going through portfolios, these features made them easier to digest and stand out from the rest. I am excited and inspired to create a portfolio of my own!